As Director of Center for Health Law Studies, I administer one of the premiere health law programs in the U.S., having been ranked first among health law programs by US News and World Report for all but one of the last 14 years running and has never been outside of the top three since the inception of the rankings. More than 100 law students participate in a wide variety of programs operated through the Center, including a health law concentration, four health-law related dual-degree programs, a Washington DC semester program, and a student-edited law journal. The Center also hosts several distinguished health law speakers and a practitioner-in-residence as well as an annual health law symposium and a workshop for health law scholars that is jointly sponsored by the American Society of Law Medicine and Ethics.
